SHAKEUP AT THE CIA

The changing of the guard at the Central Intelligence Agency continues apace. Since George Bush replaced William Colby as head of the agency three months ago, the No. 2 man, Lt. Gen. Vernon Walters, has retired, making way for Henry Knoche, a veteran administrator and analyst. Last week, the head of clandestine operations, William Nelson, departed with a medal. (His post is expected to go to another veteran clandestine operator, William Wells.) Also reported on the departure list are George Carver, head of the office that makes final "estimates" on intelligence, and Carl Duckett, chief of science and technology, who directed the attempted raising of a sunken Russian submarine in the Pacific. This means six of the CIA's top eight men will be new—the biggest shakeup in the agency's 29-year history.
